In times of great trouble a country's leader often defines its fate. Let's take a closer look on two bright examples of this: Alfred the Great and Winston Churchill.

The two personalities have much in common. Both ~~statesmen~~ became leaders of their countries in a state of war, and were able to save them, both won renown for their great deeds.

However, they differ a lot. Alfred was from a royal family and therefore inherited his crown, while Churchill was a commoner who had to persevere his status, not to mention the difference between historic periods they lived in. They ruled territories and enemies. Personally, though I'm not sure these people should be compared.

Consider Churchill's impact on British history to be more significant, as the enemy he saved his country from was more deadlier. The Nazis aimed not to just conquer, as the Danish did, but to rub whole peoples out of existence. A Danish invasion, as we assume.

In times of great trouble a country's Leader often defines its fate. Let us take a closer look on two bright examples of this: Alfred the Great and Winston Churchill.

The two personalities have much in common. Both statesmen became leaders of their countries in a state of a war and were able to save them, both won renown for their ~~the~~ great deeds.

However, they differ a lot. Alfred was from a royal family and therefore inherited his crown, while Churchill was a commoner who had to persevere his status, not to mention the difference in historic periods they lived in, territories they ruled and enemies they fought.

Though I'm not sure if these people should be compared, personally, I consider Churchill's impact on British history to be more significant, as the enemy he saved his country from was deadlier — the Nazis aimed not just to conquer, as the Danish did, but to rub whole peoples out of existence.
